compass ('kʌmpəs), *sb.*¹ (a. and adv.) Forms: 3-6 compace, 3-7 -pas(e, 4-7 -passe, (5 compaas, 6 coom-, coumpasse), 4- compass; also 3-6 cumpas, 4 -pass, -pase, 4-6 -passe, 5 Sc. cumpaiss, (8 cumpace). [a. F. compas (12th c. in Littré) 'measure, pair of compasses, circle'; in mod.F. also 'mariner's compass'; = Pr. compas, Sp. compas 'pair of compasses, measure, rule of life, pattern', Pg. compasso 'pair of compasses', It. compasso 'a compasse, a round, also a paire of compasses' (Florio); med.L. compassus = circinus pair of compasses (Du Cange). Cf. also Ger. compass, kompass, mariner's compass, formerly also gnomon, sun-dial, portable dial, Du. kompas, Sw. compass, kompass, Da. compas, Norw. kompas, (all) mariner's compass. (This is the exclusive sense in the Teutonic langs., as 'pair of compasses' is predominant in the Romanic.)

The history of this word and its associated verb in the Romanic langs. has not yet been determined, and it presents many points of uncertainty. It is doubtful whether the sb. is Common Romanic (the Sp. being app. from Fr. or Pr.), and as yet uncertain whether the sb. is derived from the vb., or the vb. from the sb. If the sb. was the origin, it would predicate a L. type compassus*, f. com- together or intensive + ? passus step, pace; if the vb. was the earlier, compassare would be 'to pass or step together' or 'completely' (see Diez passare), and compassus*, compasso, the action of doing so. The early history of the senses of the sb. is equally obscure: in OF., 'measure', primarily perhaps 'measure kept in walking together', 'artifice, subtilty', and 'pair of compasses', appear all to be early senses; it is at present impossible to say whether the instrument took its name from 'measuring' or from 'equal stepping'. It is probable that the sense 'circumference, circle, round' which is slightly exemplified in OF., but has received so great a development in Eng., is derived from the name of the instrument; but the converse is also possible; cf. L. circinus compasses, from circa round, etc.; also Ger. zirkel, (1) circle, (2) compasses. The later application to the Mariner's Compass, recognized in modern French, but chiefly developed in English and the Teut. langs., is also of obscure origin; it may easily have arisen out of the sense 'circle' or 'circuit', as showing the circle of the winds; but in German this sense appears to have been preceded by those of 'gnomon' and 'sun-dial', which may point in another direction. The Greek name of the circinus or compasses was διαβήτης, from διαβαίνειν to stride or walk with the legs apart, to stride, step, or pass over: it is not impossible that compassus and compassare may have been employed to render these words, and as διαβήτης also meant the gnomon of a sun-dial, it is conceivable that this indicates the way in which compassus came to be used for dial, and mariner's compass.

The OF. senses all appear early in ME. In the uncertainty as to the relations between these, it is impossible to arrange them in any certain order in Eng., and that adopted is merely provisional, and subject to alteration when Romanic scholars shall have ascertained the previous history of the word in their own domain.]

Performance provides evidence for the investigation of competence. 1968 CHOMSKY & HALLE Sound Pattern Eng. i. 3 One fundamental factor involved in the speaker-hearer's performance is his knowledge of the grammar that determines an intrinsic connection of sound and meaning for each sentence. The history is by no means clear. In reference to literary 'compiling', compīlātor was applied reproachfully by rivals to Vergil, and this is commonly taken as = 'plunderer'; but Isidore (a. 640), in reference to this very circumstance, says 'Compilator, qui aliena dicta suis permiscet, sicut solent pigmentarii in pila diversa mixta contundere', where the etymological explanation 'to mix in a mortar', implies at least that no sense of 'plunder' any longer attached to the word. In med.L. Du Cange has compilatus = 'exstructus', said of an arch; Godef. has OF. compilé = 'constructed, built', of a palace, which seem also to point to some other derivation. compliment ('kɒmplɪmənt), sb. Also 7 complyment. [Adopted in end of 17th c. from F. compliment, 16th c. ad. It. complimento, 'expression of respect and civility to another by words or by acts'. The L. complēmentum, Romanic complimento, became in OF. complement (compliement), in It. compimento, with the original sense of 'filling up, fulfilment, accomplishment'; in OCat. complimento, Sp. cumplimiento, there was a special development of use, as in the verb (see COMPLY), giving the sense 'observance or fulfilment of the requirements and forms of courtesy', which was adopted in It. in the form complimento, and thence passed into Fr. and Eng. Compliment is thus a doublet of COMPLEMENT (the form directly from Latin). The latter was in use in this sense about a century before the introduction of the French word, which slowly took its place between 1655 and 1715: see COMPLEMENT sb. 9, where the earlier history of this sense may be seen; cf. also COMPLY.

comply (kəm'plaɪ), v.[1] Also 7 -ie. [Appears first about 1600. In sense 1, it answers to L. complēre to fill up, fulfil, accomplish, COMPLETE. This verb became in Romanic complīre, whence It. compire, compiere, Pr. and OF. complir (see COMPLISH), all in the original sense. But in OCat. complir or Sp. cumplir, the sense underwent the development 'to fill up, make up what is wanting, satisfy, satisfy the requirements or forms of courtesy' = comply with, in sense 2 below. In this latter sense, complire appears to have been adopted in 16th c. Italian, by the side of the native compire in the original sense; and the It. was evidently the immediate source of our sense 2. (In the same way the OCat. or Sp. form and sense of the derivative sb. complimento, complimiento, was the source of It. complimento, and so of the 16th c. F. compliment, and 17th c. Eng. COMPLIMENT.) As to the form of comply cf. SUPPLY (L. supplē-re, It. supplī-re, OF. soupley-er (15th c. suppleyer, suppléer), late ME. sowplé, 15th c. supple, supplie, supply. On the model of this, and with the same relation of form to L. complēre, It. complire, that supply bore to supplēre, supplire, but without the same antecedent history, comply appears to have come into use in the end of the 16th c. (OF. complir was by that time obsolete.) In the sense-development in English there has been a tendency to association with PLY, Fr. plier, L. plicāre to bend, so as to make 'bending to the will of another' a more prominent part of the notion: cf. esp. COMPLIANT.]

compurgator ('kɒmpɜːgeɪtə(r), kəm'pɜːgətə(r)). Also 6 -our. [a. med.L. compurgātor, or F. compurgateur (14th c. in Godef.), n. of action f. L. compurgāre to purge completely; in mediæval or modern times, app. taken as if from com- together with + purgātor purger, clearer. (The second pronunciation is found in verse of 17-18th c.)]

1. A witness to character who swore along with the person accused, in order to the acquittal of the latter.

Originally a term of the Canon Law, appearing first, according to Du Cange, in the writings of Pope Innocent III (1198-1216), XVI. Ep. 158, and c. ix. and xiii. de Purgatione Canonica; it occurs in the Corpus Juris Canonici, in Decret. Greg. IX (1227-41) v. Tit. XXIV. c. v, vii. Earlier Latin names, referring to the laws of the Northern nations, were Sacramentales (Laws of Alemanns, Frisians, Longobards, etc.); Consacramentales (Capitula of Charlemagne, Laws of Cnut, and of Hen. I, c. 64, 66, 87); Sacramentarii (Pope John VIII, 872, 882); Juratores, Conjuratores (Salic & Alem. Laws, etc., etc.). In England the term compurgator appears to have been used only in ecclesiastical law until the 17th and 18th c., when legal antiquaries and historians began to apply it retrospectively in sense 1 b.

a. In Canon Law, Applied to witnesses who either swore to the credibility of the accused when he purged himself by oath, or otherwise swore to his innocence or orthodoxy, so as to clear him from a charge.

Inquis.* II. 208. 1760 BURN Eccl. Law (1797) III. 276 By his own oath affirming his innocency, and the oaths of twelve compurgators as to the belief of it.

b. In reference to OE. times (and more generally to ancient Teutonic law), the usual term, with modern historians, for the 'oath-helpers' whom a person on trial was allowed to call in to swear that, to their belief, as neighbours of the accused and acquainted with his character, he was speaking truth in making oath of his innocence. Also, sometimes applied by modern legal writers to the same persons in Wager of Law.

A native name for the consacramentales (Ger. eides-helfer) is found only in the oldest Kentish Laws, viz. æwda, pl. æwdan (L. of Hlōðhære and Eadric 2, 4; L. of Wihtræd 23) evidently a deriv. of æwe 'law'. Elsewhere they appear merely as 'his ȝeferan' his fellows, 'þa þe him midstandað'. In OHG. gieido (Hildeb. in Grimm) f. eid oath: cf. the latinized 'cum aidis suis' in Laws of the Longobards c. 364. The oath of the æwdan was 'On þone Drihten, se áð is clæne and unmæne þe N. swór' (Schmid, Gesetze 406).

con (kɒn), v.[1] Forms: 1 cunnan, 2–5 cunnen, (cune), 3–6 cunne, 4–9 cun; also kunne(n, kun; also 4–6 connen, (cone), 4–7 conne, 6– con. See more fully under CAN v.[1] [In the verb CAN the original vowel of the infinitive, and of all parts of the present stem except 1st and 3rd sing. pres. indic., was u: thus Inf. cunnan, ME. cunne(n, cun; Ind. pres. 2nd sing. cunne, later cunnest, pl. cunnon, ME. cunne(n, cun; Conj. pres. cunne, pl. cunnen; pr. pple. cunnand, ME. -end, -ing; vbl. sb. cunning. These u forms survived more or less all through the ME. period: see CAN v.[1] A.; but in accordance with the scribal practice of writing o for u, in contact with m, n, u (v), w, they were often spelt connen, conne, con; the pronunciation is however proved by numerous rimes with sone, sonne, son (= son), sonne, son (= sun), yronne (= y-run), wonne, won (OE. wunian), etc. The form of the 1st and 3rd sing. I can, he can, also varied from OE. times with con (cǫn), the regular Old WS. type (see Sievers Ags. Gramm. §65). I con (in Cast. Loue 1071, riming with for-þon) is found for I can in some texts even after 1400; but long before this can prevailed as the midland and northern form, at least in senses 1 and 2. The vowel-type of the 1st and 3rd sing. pres. ind. was gradually extended to the 2nd sing. (cǫnst, canst), the plural (we cǫn, can), the conj. pres., and the infin. (cǫn, can)—the last in Standard Eng. only from end of 15th c. The u forms thus remained intact only in the pple. and vbl. sb. CUNNING, q.v. About the same time a differentiation of forms and senses became manifest: can became established in sense 2 'to be able', and predominant in sense 1 'to know'; but cun, con, were retained and extended to all parts in sense 3 'to learn', and the phrase to cun or con thanks, sense 4. This cun, con, was mainly the representative of ME. cunn- or conn- from OE. cunn- (= kun); but in part it represented ME. con, from OE. cǫn, for can (=kɒn); hence it survived in two forms, cun, which is still common dialectally in 'to cun thanks', and con, which was the form in literary favour, both in the obs. 'to con thanks', and the still existing sense 'to con or learn a lesson'. This con is not a mere spelling variant of cun, as ME. conne was of cunne; but, from Spenser onward, con rimes with on, conned with fond, which is still the received pronunciation. The original pa. t. was cúðe, couthe, coud, could (see CAN v.[1]); but already in 14th c. in the phrase to cun thanks, sense 4, we find a pa. t. cunde, conned, with corresp. pa. pple.; at the differentiation of forms this was associated with cun, con, leaving coud, could to CAN v., so that CON is now a regular weak verb con, connest, conneth, cons, conned. Thus there remains no consciousness of connexion between can to be able, and con to learn. The earlier quotations however overlap the ground covered by CAN v.[1], and are given as supplementary to those under that word, and introductory to the later use of con, cun.]

‖con, prep. Italian:—L. cum with, appearing in certain phrases, as CON AMORE, q.v.; esp. in musical directions, e.g. con affetto with feeling, con brio with spirit and force, con delicatezza with delicacy, con delirio with frenzy, con expressione with expression, con fuoco with fire, con moto with spirited movement, con spirito with spirit, etc.

con- prefix, of Latin origin. The form assumed by the Latin preposition com (in classical L., as a separate word, cum) before all consonants except the labials, h, r, and (in later times) l, as concutĕre, condōnāre, confluĕre, congruĕre, conjūrāre, conquīrĕre, consistĕre, conspīrāre, constāre, contrahĕre, convincĕre. In earlier times it was also used before l-, as conloquium; but here it was in later times always assimilated, as colloquium, and so in the modern langs. On the other hand it was not used in classical L. before n (e.g. cōnātus, cōnubium, etc.), but has been introduced subsequently, as connātus, connubium, and this spelling is followed in English. For meaning, see COM-.

Con- occurs in compounds formed in Latin, and that have come into English through French, or (in later times) directly. Also, in words formed on the analogy of these, and sometimes in casual combinations, as conspecies, where, however, CO- is the usual prefix: hybrids, frequent in co-, are rare with con-: cf. con-brethren, con-truth.

In OF. con- before v was often reduced to co-, cu-, cou-, as in covenable, covenant, covent, coveiter, coveitus, etc., in which form these words were taken into English. Following later French, some of these were afterwards altered back to con-, as convenable, convent (but Covent Garden, F. couvent); others retain co-, as covenant, covet, covetous, against mod.F. convenant, convoiter, convoiteux.

conceptualism (kən'sɛptjuːəˌlɪz(ə)m). [mod.f. prec. + -ISM: in F. conceptualisme.]

1. The scholastic doctrine that universals (genera and species) exist as mental concepts (only): a compromise between Realism which attributed to them real existence, and Nominalism which made them mere names. (Usually considered to be a modified or differently stated form of Nominalism.)

1837–8 Sir W. Hamilton Reid's Wks. 406 note, Abelard..held a doctrine intermediate between absolute Nominalism and Realism, corresponding to the opinion since called Conceptualism. 1867 Lewes Hist. Philos. II. 29 This reality of conceptions, which is the point advanced in Conceptualism. 1875 Jowett Plato (ed. 2) IV. 132 Neither realism is the truth, nor nominalism is the truth, but conceptualism.

2. The psychological doctrine that the mind is capable of forming an idea (i.e. mental image) corresponding to the abstract and general term: held by, or attributed to, Locke and other English philosophers.

c 1837 Hamilton Metaph. (1859) II. xxv. 296 The doctrine of Nominalism has been embraced by Hobbes, Berkeley, Hume, Principal Campbell, and Mr. Stewart; while Conceptualism has found favour with Locke, Reid, and Brown.

conceptualist (kən'sɛptjuːəlɪst). [mod. f. as prec. + -IST: (perh. a. 17–18th c. F. conceptualiste).] One who holds the doctrine of CONCEPTUALISM (in sense 1 or 2): esp. in History of Philosophy, applied to those who held opinions intermediate between those of the Realists and the Nominalists.

(In med.L. called Conceptistæ: c 1475 Petrus Nigri Clipeus Thomistarum (1504) 56 a (Prantl) Una opinio est eorum qui dicunt quod universale est conceptus mentis, et isti nominantur conceptistæ.)

Also, applied by Mill to one who holds that Logic is exclusively concerned with concepts.

1785 Reid Int. Powers v. vi. Wks. 406/1 That universality which the Realists held to be in things themselves, Nominalists in names alone, they [a third party] held to be .. in our conceptions. On this account they were called Conceptualists. c 1837 Hamilton Lect. Metaph. (1859) II. xxxvi. 316 The older Conceptualists [e.g. Locke, etc.] assert that it is possible to conceive a triangle neither equilateral nor rectangular,—but both at once. 1846 Mill Logic I. vi. §1 The opinion of the Conceptualists, that a proposition is the expression of a relation between two ideas. Ibid. I. vi. §3 note, Where a Conceptualist says that a name or a proposition expresses our Idea of a thing, I should generally say (instead of our Idea) our Knowledge, or Belief, concerning the thing itself. 1855 Milman *Lat. attrib. 1843 Mill Logic I. concert (kən'sɜ:t), v. [ad. F. concerte-r (16th c.), ad. It. concertare to proportion or accord together, to agree or tune together, to sing or play in concert.

The Italian is identified by Diez with L. concertāre intr., to contend zealously, dispute, debate. Such a change of sense might conceivably come about through an intermediate 'argue out, settle by debate,' whence 'come to terms, arrange terms'; but evidence is wanting. Florio has, in 16th c. It., conserto, consertare, as parallel forms of concerto, concertare; these (if real words) point to L. consertāre* freq. of conserĕre 'to join or fit together, connect'; the same origin has been claimed by Spanish etymologists for Sp. concertar which has among other senses 'to mend a thing broken'. But here the phonetic change is unexplained. Already in 16th c. It. concerto was associated in the musical sense with concento (CONCENT); Florio, 1598, gives concerto merely with a cross-reference to concento. Hence a conjecture that concerto, concertare were perversions of conserto, consertare, under the influence of concento: but what then of Sp. concertar?

4. a. Applied by the early logicians and grammarians to a quality viewed (as it is actually found) concreted or adherent to a substance, and so to the word expressing a quality so considered, viz. the adjective, in contradistinction to the quality as mentally abstracted or withdrawn from substance and expressed by an abstract noun: thus white (paper, hat, horse) is the concrete quality or quality in the concrete, whiteness, the abstract quality or quality in the abstract; seven (men, days, etc.) is a concrete number, as opposed to the number 7 in the abstract. concrete science (SCIENCE 4 b).

Afterwards concrete was extended also to substantives involving attributes, as fool, sage, hero, and has finally been applied by some grammarians to all substantives not abstract, i.e. all those denoting 'things' as distinguished from qualities, states, and actions. The logical and grammatical uses have thus tended to fall asunder and even to become contradictory; some writers on Logic therefore disuse the term concrete entirely: see quot. 1887. In this Dictionary, concr. is prefixed to those senses in which substantives originally abstract come to be used as names of 'things'; e.g. crossing vbl. sb., i.e. abstract n. of action, concr. a crossing in a street, on a railway, etc.

From an early period used as a quasi-sb., a concrete (sc. term).

Dict.* s.v., The Scotists maintain that it is possible for man in his natural state so to live as to deserve the Grace of God, by which he may be enabled to obtain salvation; this natural fitness (congruitas) for grace, being such as to oblige the Deity to grant it. Such is the merit of congruity. The Thomists, on the other hand, contend that man, by the divine assistance, is capable of so living as to merit eternal life, to be worthy (condignus) of it in the sight of God. In this hypothesis the question of previous preparation for the grace which enables him to be worthy, is not introduced. This is the merit of condignity.

conductus (kən'dʌktəs). Pl. conducti. [med.L.; see CONDUT.] A class of musical composition, monophonic or polyphonic, practised in the 12th and 13th centuries, and not normally based upon Gregorian chant: it was originally associated with procession in church, and its metrical Latin texts are devotional, moral, or political in content.

1801 T. BUSBY Dict. Mus. s.v., Though in every other kind of discant some known melody was chosen which governed the air originating from it, in the Conductus the discant and the harmony were both of them new, and produced together. 1880 Grove's Dict. Mus. II. 372/1 The Conductus, a species of Sæcular Song, in which the subject in the Tenor was original, and suggested the other parts, after the manner of the Guida of a Canon. 1901 H. E. WOOLDRIDGE Oxf. Hist. Mus. I. vi. 248 In the pieces contained in the Florence MS. which can be identified as conducti, we may certainly observe two methods, one essentially simple and the other essentially elaborate, the admixture of which in one composition would indeed seem to constitute the classical form of this kind of music. 1940 G. REESE Mus. Middle Ages (1941) xi. 308 In the absence of a Gregorian tenor lies one of the main differences between the conductus on the one hand and the organa and motets on the other. The conductus is thus the first polyphonic type in which the composer was able to give entirely free rein to his imagination. 1954 Grove's Dict. Mus. (ed. 5) II. 405 The large majority of conducti have these interludes.

1934 J. NEYMAN in Jrnl. R. Statistical Soc. XCVII. 562 The form of this solution consists in determining certain intervals, which I propose to call the confidence intervals.., in which we may assume are contained the values of the estimated characters of the population, the probability of an error in a statement of this sort being equal to or less than 1 $-\epsilon$, where ϵ is any number $0<\epsilon<1$, chosen in advance. The number ϵ I call the confidence cœfficient. 1939 A. E. TRELOAR Elem. Statistical Reasoning x. 133 Since $\pm 3\sigma$ in a normal distribution defines a central probability value of 99·973 per cent, the points $\bar{x} \pm 3\sigma_{\bar{x}}$ may be referred to as the 99·973 per cent confidence limits. 1968 *Brit. (These senses are not found in Fr. which for them uses confiant.) In senses 6–8 and B. 1–2 answering to F. confident, -ente, app. 16th c. ad. It. confidente 'confident, trusty', 'a trusty friend'.

This sense prob. originated in the application of the word to two friends who mutually confide in or trust each other, and hence are trusted by each other; the latter or inferred part of the notion becoming at length the only one thought of, as in Littré's explanation 'he or she to whom one confides one's secrets, one's intimate thoughts.' The historical instances given by Littré show that the F. word had in 16–17th c. the wider sense of 'trusty adherent, partisan,' like our sense B. 1.]
